Popular November 13, 2019 This is not the first time the players have done this. Under intense scrutiny from the media and the public, the players and NFL itself, both the Eagles and the league have faced calls to move on from the suspended players. The NFL and the players' union are in talks, but a resolution is still very far away, and even if a compromise is reached, the players are still facing serious legal consequences. In response, the players' associations of the other 30 teams have gotten together to form a united front against the suspensions. "We stand united against the very real threat posed by the use of PEDs in professional sports," said Donald J. Trump Jr., the president of the players' association. "We are motivated by a shared belief that the very survival of our great game is at stake." In a separate development, the NFL is planning to hold a league meeting and discussion, during which the league will consider the possibility of taking a harder line in punishing players caught using PEDs in the future, according to an official with knowledge of the situation. This new alliance could be a significant step in the long-running fight against steroids, which has been a concern of the NFL since the early 2000s, and has flared up again in the past year. Several players have already been suspended for using steroids in the 2014 season, and suspensions for other players are expected to be announced next week. The NFL has tried to take a hard line with players, including with the suspension of former wide receiver Hines Ward, who was penalized $50,000 for lying to the league and using a banned substance to help him lose weight. The league has also tried to keep the suspensions low, with most players receiving a one-game ban or a one- or two-week suspension. While that approach has worked for the league, especially with fans who have come to embrace the strategy of an NFL that is willing to enforce a zero tolerance policy, the players' union has fought back. Now, the players' associations of the other 30 teams are coming together, hoping to convince the owners to change their strategy. That strategy involves a more moderate approach, with the suspension length rising with the severity of the offense, according to multiple league sources, with four to six games being typical in cases like this. The league is well aware of the rift among players.
