In a sample of 600 participants in a longitudinal study of Alzheimer's disease, we examined the effects of depression on the presence and course of coexisting illness. The participants were selected from an epidemiological sample of community-residing individuals 65 years and older in Honolulu. We examined the relationship of depressive symptoms to the presence of chronic illnesses at three time points during the study, and the presence of depression at these time points in relation to the presence of chronic illnesses. For women, the presence of chronic illnesses at time 1 and time 3 was predicted by chronic illnesses at time 2. For men, the presence of depression at time 1 was predictive of chronic illnesses at time 3. These relationships were found after controlling for age, time 1 level of functional status, and time 1 presence of the coexisting illness. We also found that having chronic illnesses was a risk factor for the presence of depression at time 1 and that presence of depression was a risk factor for chronic illness progression. Finally, we found that there was a significant relationship between coexisting illnesses and depression.*
