It is one of the oldest and most famous castles in the world. History The first fort was built by the Britons in the late 8th century. This was a timber palisaded fort measuring by. This was the first stronghold at Oban, built on a promontory on the east side of the entrance of the Firth of Lorne. The fort was attacked by Vikings in 875. The first reference to a castle is in 1085. In 1171, the castle was destroyed by the English during the Wars of Scottish Independence. During the reign of King James I, the castle was rebuilt as a large square castle with four towers, as a stone castle measuring. The four towers are known as the 'watch towers'. These date from this period and are among the earliest and best preserved in Scotland. In 1720, King George I of England bestowed on the then Marquess of Bute the lands of Oban, but it was the marquess's wife, the beautiful Margaret Butler, who gained much influence over her husband and secured her title and lands for life. She obtained a charter from George I to demolish the castle

To reduce time and energy required for particle separation, we successfully developed a novel microfluidic platform based on the nucleation of a liquid to separate microparticles by gravitational forces. The nucleated flow was created by a temperature increase due to the Joule heating in a glass capillary. The temperature was controlled by an AC current supplied to the heating electrode. We applied this method to the separation of polystyrene beads with diameters of 50, 100, and 250 microm and to the separation of living cells. The particles separated by gravity were easily collected by a magnet placed near the outlet of the separation channel. A few millimeters of distance was required to capture most of the particles. Separation efficiency was remarkably improved by the nucleated flow, compared to conventional gravitational-based separation. We analyzed the particle separation efficiency by numerical simulations.
