Mitochondria have recently been recognized as an important source of reactive oxygen species, both directly through the electron transport chain, and indirectly through the production of hydrogen peroxide and superoxide anion from the hydrolysis of molecular oxygen. Indeed, oxidative stress has been implicated in a number of neurological diseases, including Parkinson's disease, Alzheimer's disease, and Huntington's disease. Mitochondrial oxidative stress may result from reactive oxygen species produced as a by-product of the normal oxidative phosphorylation process. However, other events may contribute to a build-up of reactive oxygen species in the mitochondria, including mitochondrial damage from increased reactive oxygen species production. The production of reactive oxygen species can be measured through the oxidation of fluorescent probes such as 2,7-dichlorofluorescein diacetate (H2DCFH-DA), 5-(and-6)-carboxy-2',7'-dichlorofluorescein diacetate (carboxy-H2DCFDA), and 2',7'-dichlorodihydrofluorescein diacetate (DCFH-DA). However, these probes are not mitochondria-specific, and can be affected by numerous cellular processes, including esterase activity and cellular pH. To overcome this difficulty, a number of mitochondrial-specific fluorescent probes have been developed (Beard et al., Mol. Biol. Cell, 8, 4243-4252, 1997; Busk et al., J. Biol. Chem. 274, 12419-12423, 1999; Gerhardt et al., J. Biol. Chem. 274, 24798-24804, 1999; van Oijen et al., Biochem. J. 343, 269-278, 2000;
