TSC/TSS elements are clustered near the transcription start site (TSS) of most bacterial genes. TSC elements have been found in more than 50% of sequenced bacterial genomes, with many more of unknown function. Recent genome analyses have found that TSC elements are often highly conserved among species. In this study, we address the question of what kind of TSC elements function as TSS-like elements by deleting or mutating TSC/TSS elements from the P(BAD) promoter of Escherichia coli and from the lacZ promoter of E. coli and Yersinia pestis. Our results suggest that although TSC elements are required for promoter function in all the species tested, the general function of TSC elements as TSS-like elements varies, depending on their context.
