In order to test the performance of the upcoming Tesla Model 3, Musk is relying on some interesting motors and an oldie-but-a-goodie, the 1995 Oldsmobile Beta Turbo, owned by a Colorado Tesla owner. The test was conducted during the production of the Model 3 to see how it compares to the Chevrolet Bolt and the Toyota Camry XSE both of which recently had their production vehicle debuts. The Model 3 was faster than the Bolt on every test except for their two performance simulations with Musk bragging that the Tesla could outperform it on its 200-mile performance route because its 0-60 times are much less than the Bolt's. Musk also was confident that the Model 3 would be up to the challenge of today's local roads while maintaining "still be safe in like a 7.5G worst case scenario, by far." The test is not from a production line vehicle and will not be the production vehicle's launch year vehicle. A quick disclaimer... This is an unpaid advertisement. The company you know as The Autoblog, Friday wrote about the new Tesla Model 3 during a trip to California. The company's senior editor, Jeff Conrad, and senior editor, Josh Miller said there were some teething problems with the vehicle's functionality, "we were able to successfully prove that a higher-performance, long-range electric vehicle can make it up and down more than a mild mountain road, even in inclement weather, that it can handle some of the most challenging terrain on our route and, once it gets its act together and starts displaying some of its true capabilities, it will feel like a luxury performance car." Conrad said that the vehicle was "fun to drive, handles extremely well and is incredibly stable." He gave the vehicle a top score of four points in the SUV category, the car category, and the overall category on his test drive and he warned about the rush to buy the model this year. The cruise control isn't a feature it has, but it is an option and seems to work well in the video so if the lucky owner wants to try that function in the production version, he'
