The 3C-like protease (3CLpro) is an important target for drug development against coronaviruses. The recent discovery of the first novel coronavirus and the outbreak of severe acute respiratory syndrome (SARS) caused great concerns on new drug development. With this in mind, we have conducted the molecular simulations studies on the 3CLpro of SARS coronavirus to investigate the molecular basis for its mechanism of action. The catalytic residue was found to be the serine 381. The sodium ion was observed to play a role in the stabilization of the transition state. The active site formed by the catalytic residues provides a large binding pocket, which is consistent with its enzymatic function. The results of the molecular dynamics and free energy computation showed that there exist significant interactions between the inhibitor and the protein, and the binding between the hydrophilic and hydrophobic groups of the inhibitor led to a favorable binding free energy, making this design a promising candidate for inhibitor design.
