lucky enough to spot an amazingly rare and beautiful species, the Humboldt squid.” The Humboldt Squid is a deep-sea squid that can grow up to 20 inches in length. The Australian Museum stated that this species of squid has declined by 90 percent since 1960. Chumley said that, in the water, McKee and he spotted a big, powerful squid, and after he got close, it started to swim in circles. “My heart was in my throat as I watched this Humboldt squid performing its signature display for us,” Chumley said. McKee captured the moments on video, and, after they surfaced, told Chumley to put the creature into the net. “Once we had landed the squid, Jason got it into a pool of water and I spent 15 minutes in close-up, sitting on a rock, as this squid crawled across my legs, looking at me,” Chumley said. “I was a captive audience and didn’t want to miss a moment. I could even see its eyes!” Chumley said he saw the squid’s head and tentacles, but had to give McKee credit for capturing the squid in an incredible location. “This species has just been found in the South Pacific, in waters near North Queensland,” Chumley said. “I Just registered this web-site (at its early stage), and now saw this. I believe this is an interesting topic that deserves more attention to be devoted to it. Please consider subscribing to the free book ‘termodinamica cengel 7 edicion’ or at least discovering it (pun intended). I found you book on Google as opposed to other sites. I believe the book may not be available elsewhere. It is in English, and you can consider that it will bring some sense of pleasure/entertainment to you. I hope you will enjoy the book, and I encourage you to share your ideas if you have something to offer regarding the book. Does Your YouTube Channel Marketing Strategy Already Suck? Here’s Why. Today’s post is part 2 of a series on 11 Common Myths that We Fall Into. In today’s post, I want to talk about one of the most fundamental myths of all – that it’s easy to drive massive amounts of traffic to your YouTube channel (or any other marketing channel). Now, there are a lot of factors that go into whether your campaigns will actually get traction, and YouTube just happens to be one of the biggest. But let’s break down what “it’s easy” really means in the context of YouTube marketing. Video Not Popular on YouTube There are millions of videos that are sitting on YouTube in various states of completion and/or decay. This is why you will see that video results remain notoriously inconsistent. If you are using YouTube for content marketing, you are only likely to get a portion of the videos you create to be viral. And there are a ton of videos that aren't even uploaded to YouTube that are still getting tons of views. In order for YouTube to be a good marketing channel, content should be on there. And the vast majority of videos that are broadcast on the site aren't relevant to your business. So your approach should shift to targeting videos that are either business related or that will help your audience live out a particular social media marketing strategy. The goal is to "feed" the algorithm, not to feed the platform as a whole. People Don't Like Your Content The same can be said of people. After all, the same algorithm is continually updating the rank order of the videos on
